

CODY OLDHAM

Cody Oldham is a professional representational wildlife and landscape oil painter who resides in the mountains of Colorado. Growing up surrounded by the forests and wilderness of the region, he developed a deep connection to the natural world through daily experiences outdoors.

Cody was introduced to oil painting and the representational art world at the age of twelve by New Zealand-based artist Andrew Tischler. From that moment forward, he dedicated himself to honing and refining his craft. He later continued his artistic education studying with Colorado-based wildlife painter Dustin Van Wechel.

Today, Cody continues to explore new visual concepts through his wildlife and landscape paintings, inviting viewers into a world many of us rarely have the opportunity to experience.

“Art is serious play. It’s hard work and long days behind the easel, but the process of creating and bringing something new into the world every day fills me with so much excitement.”

A current focus of Cody’s work is dramatic wildlife scenes.

“I love the idea of capturing rare moments in nature that we don’t get to see that often and putting them to canvas — like a herd of mountain goats descending a steep cliff face with a storm approaching over the ridge, or a puma emerging from the shadows and being lit by the early morning sun. What draws me to a scene the most is the strong direct light and the movement of the animal.”
